

Recipe for an Edible Culture Clash by gal sherizly

this is an invitation to reflect upon

edible ingredients that shape culture moments of coming together around dinner table
on celebration and grief tradition, rituals and memories what are the essentials in your kitchen? how does your cultural heritage influence it? what are the aromas, textures and flavours that remind you of home(s)*? *home(s) can be anywhere, or nowhere in this gathering we are going to prepare a tapestry of origins, a wide palette of flavours and aromas. thinking collectively, we want this meal to be shared together from common resources. if you can, please bring with you one/more ingredient/s that have been cooked by your family, relatives or otherwise.

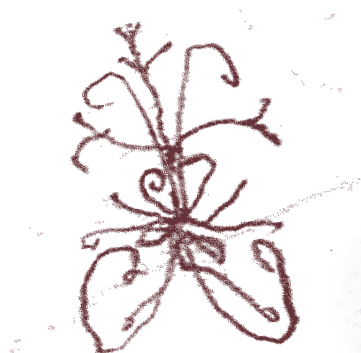

ingredients

a flavour from home
a representation of your cultural heritage or mix of origins

think of dry ingredients as spices and grains; wet ones as oils, sauces and other liquids freshness as veggies and fruits everything (and everybody) are welcome:

pre-cooked or frozen
fresh or preserved
pickled or fermented
powdery, oily or spicy

no need to be shy – nothing is "smelly" et the memory guide you instructions

- ~ this recipe is an open-source guide for collective cook-out. getting intimate with strangers and familiars through the act of sharing and exchanging knowledge(s) and resources.
- ~ bring together all the ingredients of the participants.
- ~ take a moment to sit down and tell the stories behind these ingredients—where do they come from? which dish/es are they used for? what memories do they evoke?
- ~ are there dishes coming to mind from this assemblage of ingredients? how can we infuse familiar dishes with new influences while preserving traditional techniques?
- ~ which embodied techniques are necessary to make these dishes? Exchange these knowledges with each other, learn with your hands.